Was it possible, he asked, that parents having had a disease, say measles or scarlet fever, might to some extent protect a child and cause mildness of type? He remembered a Fleet Surgeon discussing with him having a wholesale propagation of syphilis, so that the system might be rendered immune against it and the disease completely rooted out. He said that making all due allowance it must be admitted that typhoid did exist amongst the native population of India as shown by the records of the J. J. hospital and records of the Native Army also showed it. He further said that he had seen cases of undoubted typhoid amongst the Parsees. Cases with the anatomical signs had been recorded among the natives. The disease, therefore, might occur among them; and why was it so seldom seen, he asked, among them as compared with Europeans? He then alluded to a series of cases occurring amongst the members of one Parsi family; a young girl aged 10 years was the first to be attacked; soon after another sister of 15 fell ill and after her a grown up woman--all occurring together, he believed in succession. The little girl was first affected with fever and diarrhoea; her elder sister was affected after 20 days, the oldest had a similar course with haemorrhage. He was satisfied that those were cases of enteric fever. Probably other gentlemen would give their opinion upon...
