Excerpt: . . . ANALYSIS Every piece of printed matter involves four grades of work: 1) creative; 2) editorial; 3) clerical; 4) mechanical. Often the first two are performed by the author, and when there is only an occasional piece of printing, clerical details reduce themselves to a few items of printinghouse bookkeeping; but for an individual or an institution issuing large quantities of printed matter, a routine and a system of records are necessary to prevent confusion, mistakes and needless expense. The scope of the four grades is as follows: 1 Creative. This is the work of the author, who produces the subject matter and is responsible for its literary expression and accuracy, including facts, figures, proper names, technical terms and all details affecting meaning. 2 Editorial. An editor is responsible for details of literary form: i. e. paragraphing, punctuation, spelling and capitalization. He must also see that copy is so arranged and marked as to make plain the general plan and the relative rank of parts; he should know types well enough to specify those that will make these relations clearest; he must see that everything necessary to completeness is provided, such as preface, contents, chapter heads, running titles, index, correct page numbers for references; and he must also see that the publication is issued in its proper form, whether as book or pamphlet, in series or independently. But often editorial work is much on a higher plane, and an author or administrator may save much...
