Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: .organized and bravely defended they must necessarily halt. The duration of the pursuit is determined by two factors: (1) The encountering of a position of sufficient strength to resist; (2) The difficulty of moving up heavy artillery. These two reasons, operating simultaneously, have held up the German pursuit. There is no evidence in this of any change in the character of warfare. The Germans are carrying out all the principles of the war of positions. They attacked, moreover, as was to be expected, at the point of junction of the French and British, counting on a lack of co-ordination and of liaison to help them win. The German attack in the Armentieres zone must not be thought to spring from the fact that the attempt in the Amiens sector failed. It must be part of a strategic plan and have been long foreseen. It is not the last blow in a battle which may last several months. But the present situation of the Germans is not free from grave dangers to themselves. In the first place they have sacrificed thousands of lives, thereby disorganizing whole divisions and depleting the reserves capable of attacking somewhere else. They also now occupy deep salients unfavorable and even dangerous to their advanced troops. On the other hand, the British zones of Arras and Ypres constitute two salients dangerous to the defenders. The question is, which of the two adversaries will cut the other s salient and straighten out the front...
