Excerpt: . . . comparatively comfortable quarters at Phyong-yang, where I remained for six days. While the river remained open, a small Korean steamer of uncertain habits, the Hariong, plied nominally between Phyong-yang and Chemulpo, but actually ran from Po-san, a point about 60 li lower down the Tai-dong, which above it is too shallow and full of sandbanks for vessels of any draught, necessitating the transshipment of all goods not brought up by junks of small tonnage. There was, however, no telegraph between Po-san and Phyong-yang, no one knew when the steamer arrived except by cargo coming up the river, and she only remained a few hours; so that my visit to Phyong-yang was agitated by the fear of losing her, and having to make a long land journey when time was precious. There was no Korean post, and the Japanese military post and telegraph office absolutely...
